How is liposuction performed?

- The surgeon will start by giving local anesthesia to the patient to make sure that the treatment is pain-free.
- The surgeon will make incisions near the area to be treated. The incisions are less than half an inch in length.
- The surgeon will then insert a thin hollow tube called a cannula through the incision. The cannula is attached to the vacuum pump or syringe and the surgeon will move it back and forth to suction out excess fat cells.
- Once the desired amount of fat is removed, the surgeon will close the incisions.
- The patients will then be monitored for recovery and are given compression garments to reduce swelling and bruising.
